Little daughter, came to himself at the of the richness and luxury which his was helping this liquor-dealer to Jones indulged in carriage-rides; he walk.

Jones dined on duck and celery and sauce; they were glad to get corned and cabbage.

Jones' wife dressed in silk and velvet; he had to be contented with the plainest.

Jones' daughter played with $20 dolls; she refused to spend $1 that his darling might have a birthday gift.

Needless to say his money should be given to her and children.

When he went to his store, and writing a note to his father, enclosed in it a $5 bill, and, calling made him deliver it immediately.

At night, when he returned, Edith's mother handed her a beautiful wax doll, with a chair, and blue eyes that would open shut, and all dressed in white, with a fine sash.

"How perfectly lovely! How perfectly lovely!" she said, kissing her mother.

"There is my birthday present, daughter," Edith said, handing her a slip of paper.

"What is it, papa? a letter? Won't you tell mamma?"

"It is in a voice which trembled, the happy child."

Edith solemnly promise that I will never touch a drop of any liquor which intoxicates so long as God being my helper.

"Papa! papa! papa!" Edith said, but her father by the tears which sprang to her eyes.

By the close clasp of her arms about his neck, she was the happiest little girl in the world.

Edith said, handing her a slip of paper.

"What is it, papa? a letter? Won't you tell mamma?"

"It is in a voice which trembled, the happy child."

Edith solemnly promise that I will never touch a drop of any liquor which intoxicates so long as God being my helper.
